

The map displays the population distribution of the 65+ age group in the United Kingdom for the years 1990 and 1999. Each county is marked with two numbers: a red number for the 1990 population and a blue number for the 1999 population. The map shows a general increase in population across most counties, with significant growth in the south and east of England. The highest populations are concentrated in the southeast, particularly in counties like Kent, Surrey, and Essex. The map also shows a higher density of population in the south and east of England compared to the north and west.
